It's not just for kicks...

Steel's "profit" pennies are really kept steppin'

When all the regular bills were paid out of the money a steel company took in during the last half dozen years, 1952 through 1957, what was left averaged a little over 6 cents out of each dollar... Those six pennies are called "profit."

(Of course profits in 1958's first quarter are way below that level.)

The penny sextet gets a strenuous workout — because there aren't enough of them for the jobs that should be done.

More than half of those six cents goes into plant improvement — new buildings, new machinery and other equipment, new sources of raw material. This is to assure everybody more and better steel.

Then the remaining pennies go into dividends for the nearly 900,000 people who are steel company stockholders.

Only when these dividends offer a reasonably fair return can the steel companies hope to attract new capital for modernization and growth — and to keep active the more than half a million workers who produce...

Steel... metal of a million uses
